HOW WE REPORT THIS PAGE

The Washington Post uses vote count data from the Associated Press, which relies on a 50-state network of local reporters to gather election results directly from state, county and local elections offices. AP checks vote tallies against state and county election websites to ensure they are accurate. AP also calls winners when they are certain that a candidate will win. The Post is reporting AP race calls for most elections in 2024, but will use additional vetting and sourcing before reporting race calls in presidential swing states and key Senate races.
